To whom it may concern

My qualifications are those of B.A. Honours Class II (1) in Mathematics from the University of Oxford, and M.Sc. with Distinction in Mathematical Logic from the University of London, and I was formerly employed as a computer programmer by the British Post Office.

I have studied the writings of many philosophers, therapists and religious teachers. Bhagwan is outstanding among them all. His intellectual clarity cuts through philosophical confusions which tie other writers in knots, and he can make plain to Western minds the original intended meaning of the words of the great Eastern religious leaders with an authority of experience few can match.

Practising his teaching in my own everyday life has led to great psychological changes and religious understanding, far more so than the work of any other leader I have experienced, including the Christian church, the "growth movement", and EST.

I just can't imagine how anyone who has seen him, read his books, or seen his disciples' maturity, can possibly regard him as anything other than a most outstanding teacher.
